

Abstract:

The paper investigates the effects of the operation of green funds on the efficiency of investment made by firms in developing the environment. We present a simple model where a fund manager has the ability to separate firms that undertake environment improving steps from those who don't. We show that such arrangements are efficient.